

The Shout-Out Board

A shout-out board for the form room: a board header, a stack of slips and two minutes on a Friday. Anybody in the form can fill in a slip about something somebody else did that week, and the slips go up on the board and stay there until the next lot. Print once, cut the slips up, and it runs itself after the first fortnight. It is appreciation rather than reward: nothing here is earned by coming top of anything.

Before you start. Read every slip before it goes on the board. Most will be exactly what you hoped for, but a few will be a joke at somebody's expense. If you do not read them first, one of those will end up on the wall. It takes a minute and it is the difference between this working and this being something you have to take down.

Print these

Page 2	The board header and the rules. One of each, cut out and put up once.
Page 3	The slips, six to a sheet. A couple of sheets a week is plenty for a form of thirty.
Page 4	Twelve things worth a shout-out. For you, not for the board.

How it works

Step	What happens
Before	Put the header at the top of a board or a bit of wall, with the rules underneath it and a stack of slips and a pen beside it.
1	Tell the form how it works. The two rules that matter are that they write what the person actually did, and that they cannot put themselves on it.
2	Leave it alone during the week. Slips go in an envelope or a tray, not straight onto the wall.
3	Friday, two minutes. Read them, put them up, and read two or three of them out loud. That last part is what makes anybody bother next week.
4	Take them down the following Friday and put the new ones up. Give the old ones to the people they are about instead of binning them.

Worth knowing

- Write the first few yourself. Nobody wants to fill in the first slip, and a board with four on it by Friday of week one is a board the form will use in week two.
- Page 4 exists because the first fortnight of any board like this is the same three students and a lot of sport. Keep it in your drawer and use it when the slips thin out.
- A form of thirty does not produce thirty slips a week and should not be made to. Four or five real ones a week beat a rota where everybody gets a turn.
- It sits alongside Praise Postcards, which goes home and comes from you, and Compliment Chain, which is anonymous and daily. This one is public, weekly, and signed.

Read them before they go up, and read two of them out loud.

The board header and the rules

Cut both out. The header goes at the top of the board and the rules go underneath it, where somebody standing at the board can read them.

Shout-outs

Things people did this week that were worth saying out loud.

How it works

1. Anybody can put somebody on this board. Take a slip and fill it in.
2. Write what they actually did. Not that they are nice.
3. You cannot put yourself on it, but you can put the same person on it more than once.

The slips

Six to a sheet. Cut them apart and keep a stack of them somewhere anybody can pick one up, next to the board rather than on your desk.

Twelve things worth a shout-out

For you, not for the board. The first few weeks of a board like this fill up with the same three students, and these are the things that get missed.

- Stayed behind and helped clear up without being asked to.
- Said the thing nobody else in the room was going to say.
- Sat next to the new student on the first day.
- Kept going with something they are not good at.
- Changed their mind because somebody gave them a better argument.
- Apologised properly, and was not made to.
- Asked the question everybody else was too embarrassed to ask.
- Was here on time every day this week, after a half term of not being.
- Noticed somebody had gone quiet, and did something about it.
- Lent somebody something and did not make a thing of it afterwards.
- Took a correction without arguing about it.
- Did the boring half of a group task so somebody else did not have to.

None of these is an achievement. The list is built that way on purpose. A board that only carries results ends up belonging to the same three students by October, and everybody else stops reading it.
