

Check-In Record Sheet

A spreadsheet with every student in your form down the side and the six half terms across the top, so you can see at a glance who you have had a proper conversation with and who has quietly gone most of a year without one. Tell it which half term you are in and everyone you have not seen yet turns amber. It takes a few seconds a week, and it catches the students who never cause any trouble and never ask you for anything.

Before you start. This is a record of who you have spoken to, not a record of what was said. Anything a student discloses goes to your designated safeguarding lead the same day, through your school's own system, and not onto this sheet. Keep the file where only you can open it, and write nothing in the last column that you would not be comfortable with the student reading over your shoulder.

What you get

What	What it is
Spreadsheet	The record sheet: thirty rows, the six half terms, and a column for anything to come back to
This page	The guide, if you want it on paper. Nothing else here needs printing.

How it works

Step	What happens
1	Open the spreadsheet, type over the example row, and write your form list down the Student column. Fill in the form and the academic year at the top.
2	Set the half term you are in now in the yellow box. Every student you have not yet seen in that half term turns amber.
3	Each time you have a proper one to one, however short, put the date in that half term's column. The amber clears and the counts at the top move.
4	Once a week, look at what is still amber. Those are the students to go to next. Use the last column for the one thing you want to come back to.

Worth knowing

- A proper check-in can be two minutes at the door. What matters is that it happened and that you noticed it was their turn.
- The amber rows are usually the quiet students rather than the difficult ones, which is the whole reason a list like this is worth keeping.
- It opens in Excel and in Numbers, and in Google Sheets once you upload it to your Drive. The highlighting and the counts come with it.
- Conversation Starters gives you something to open with on the days you would rather not start from nothing.

Five conversations a week takes you round a form of thirty every half term. Start with whatever is amber.
